

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

My sincere thanks to George David Miller for accepting my present work as part of the Value Inquiry Books Series in Philosophy of Education. He has been as eager as I to get this manuscript into print. Fortunately he has been more patient, critical, and far sighted than I in insuring this book's intellectual respectability. I am always grateful to work with an editor who is one step ahead of me.

Rodopi Executive Editor, Robert Ginsberg, consistently finds ways to improve book manuscripts. I have learned more from his counsel than I can put into words. Repeatedly I have posed questions to him requiring, I thought, one word or brief replies. His impeccable judgment has invariably dissected the complexity and broader dimensions of my query. The results have meant insightful conversations in which Robert Ginsberg has taught me so much more about my goals than I thought possible.

I can never adequately thank Managing Editor Eric van Broekhuizen for his expertise in the mechanics of publication. He is unequalled in his professionalism and humanity.

Thanks to my colleagues and friends, Triton College Dean of Liberal Arts, Edmund C. Forst, Jr., and Loyola Professor, Robert H. Lichtenbert for their continuing support and encouragement. I bring them endless problems and questions; they fortunately respond with answers I need but often do not want to hear.

My Chapter on the information explosion has been an especially tricky one. I have learned much from the Doctoral Dissertation of Mark Donald Bowles, concerning this topic. He has graciously reviewed a version of the chapter and offered vital suggestions.

Grace Budrys was kind enough to suggest that her family member living in another State, Paola Lortie, could help me with questions about John Dewey. I have the feeling that Paola Lortie knows as much about John Dewey's writings as did Dewey. I am indebted to Lortie for promptly providing me with material about Dewey, without which my references to him could not have been included. My appreciation to Budrys for acting as intermediary and messenger between Lortie and myself.

Thomas J. Murphy and Leigh Maginnis gave me much insight into the issues of specialization and subspecialization involving chemistry and biology, respectively. I appreciated the time each generously gave to listening to me about my project. The data they gave me were invaluable, The directions in which they pointed became beacons for discovery beyond what I imagined.

Members of the Reference Department of DePaul University Libraries have been magnificent. Margaret Power, Terry Taylor, Susan Clarke, Rosemary Cooper, Robert Acker, Jeffrey Kosokoff, and Kara Malenfant are research geniuses. Time and again they have answered what I felt were unanswerable questions. More than once they helped me by rewording my searches. I have thanked them for their past assistance, to which they have responded that they had forgotten that they helped me. This acknowledgment hopefully shows the world that I have not forgotten their kindnesses. My apologies to all other members of the reference department whose names I have unintentionally omitted, and whose help has been critical.

John Rininger of DePaul University's Interlibrary Loan Department is in a class by himself. If he ever joins the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) as a Special Agent, the Bureau would have one more superior investigator. His tenacity, patience, and ingenuity in researching material for endnotes has been the difference between my having and not having critical references I needed. He has the uncanny ability to find a single name or word written on a page written in print so small that the writing makes fine-print look like large-print.

My thanks to the readers: Susan Arenz, Laurie Melvin, Cynthia M. Simko, Erin Ramsden, and Jack Johnson.

My acknowledgments imply that all the people are so intimately associated with this work that these persons are responsible for the final version you are reading. That view is partially true. Any success resulting from this book is due mainly to the efforts of the persons above. I am the person taking or refusing advice for my final version. I take full responsibility for all shortcomings in the following pages.
