

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

While this is an original work, I owe sincere thanks to several people. My long-time friend and colleague, Edmund C. Forst, Jr., Dean of Waubensee, has suffered, smiled, and triumphed with me in my efforts to develop and bring to fruition this book. His ideas and toil are unseen by all but the author. Ed has read the entire manuscript. Our many conversations, lunches, debates, agreements, and disagreements have made this a better book. He always senses the direction which I tend to miss, and tactfully points toward the correct approach.

My deep appreciation to Robert H. Lichtenbert of Loyola University. He has graciously read and patiently criticized the entire manuscript. His careful eye, perceptive intellect, sense of humor, and ability to read my mind were invaluable toward helping me say what I was trying to say. With his guidance, I can now say this work is precisely the one I wanted to produce.

To say George David Miller has been a special special editor is not redundant. Each page hopefully reflects his intellectual insights, personal interest, and editorial direction. Executive Editor Robert Ginsberg deserves thanks for his advice, and for always putting things into perspective. I appreciate Managing Editor Eric van Broekhuizen's help dealing with the book's mechanics.

I appreciate Jack Johnson, Mary T. Mulcahy, and Kathy S. Killmer who have graciously served as proofreaders.

This acknowledgment would be incomplete without thanks to Sue Arenz for graciously and generously assisting a demanding and impatient author.

The involvement of these individuals, however deep, in no way associates them with any shortcomings in the following pages. The author's refusal to take good advice is the sole reason for those problems.
