

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

Teachers, colleagues, students, audience members at conferences, archival and library staffs, the staff at Brill, readers for various journals, friends, kin — so many people and institutions have assisted me in this project in so many ways that to share their names and roles with the reader would require at least another chapter. I can offer only a blanket yet heartfelt thanks to all those who made the writing of this book possible.

Three teachers, however, must be mentioned for the attention that they have lavished upon me over the years. Professor John Baldwin of The Johns Hopkins University inadvertently lured me into the field of medieval history with his engaging courses, and then launched my fledgling career with his unfailingly sure advice. That I was able to study under Professor Michael McCormick both at The Johns Hopkins University and then again as a graduate student at Harvard University was one of the greatest strokes of good fortune ever to befall me. Professor Thomas N. Bisson of Harvard University oversaw the dissertation from which this book developed. He patiently waded through my work time and time again, kindly and insistently encouraging me to think harder. These three professors embody for me an inspiring combination of scholarly rigor and intellectual breadth, and while this book would have been far better had one of them written it, nevertheless I hope that they will find it a worthy token of my admiration.
