

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

This book began as a doctoral dissertation that I wrote at the University of Iowa, so I must first thank those who guided and supported my doctoral research. I owe the greatest debt to my advisor, Katherine Tachau, who introduced me to the late Middle Ages and provided immeasurable academic and personal support. I am also grateful to Scott MacDonald, James McCue, Constance Berman, and T. Dwight Bozeman for their careful comments and suggestions. My socii, Russel Friedman and Christopher Schabel, have supported and aided this project from beginning to end. The University of Iowa's Teaching-Research Fellowship and the Seashore Dissertation Fellowship allowed me two precious years of reflection and writing. I thank the Graduate College and the History Department for that support. The University Library staff, especially Pam Kacena and Chris Africa, were of invaluable help.

Many debts were also incurred in bringing this project to its present state. Richard Muller, Hester Gelber, and Curtis Daugaard read all or part of this monograph and gave helpful comments. My colleagues at Coe College and Judson College have been most supportive of this project. Much dreary, but crucial, editorial work was done by three wonderful students: Elizabeth Aylward, Kristen Rostis, Jeff Harron, and Joy Ellen Brewer. Julian Deahl and Theo Joppe at Brill have been more than patient with this novice author. Most importantly, I am grateful to Heiko A. Oberman for letting this project see the light of day.

Finally, I thank my wife, Terri.

J.L.H.
Elgin, Illinois
August, 1997