

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

A few words of appreciation must be given at the outset of this work to those who have inspired and sustained me during its writing. Søren Kierkegaard, the father of existentialism, encouraged me to live as a radical individual before God, without the comfort of applause or the accolades of the status quo. He commissioned me to negate “the system” and criticize one’s setting, one’s church, one’s concepts, and oneself. Karl Barth, the foremost theologian of our century, showed to me the importance of honoring the tradition of the church and doing theology in a historical manner. He combined in his works serious historical inquiry with a devotion to theology and a passion for Christ. In his writings, I found analysis and documentation, thought and reflection, preaching and exhortation. While Kierkegaard commissioned me to attack Christendom, Barth exhorted me to do dogmatics within the church.

On a more personal level Martin Anton Schmidt, the Medieval scholar, set a high standard for me as my mentor in Basel. He took a personal interest in my work when it was very immature, tutored me through a dissertation, and has encouraged me in this present work through the years. J. Wayne Baker, the Reformation scholar, also deserves mention as providing much needed help and encouragement, as well as Heiko Oberman, the most important historical theologian of our time, who was not only willing to publish the work but provided the basic inspiration behind its attempt to bridge the middle ages and the Reformation.

The research was conducted over a number of years at numerous libraries and institutions. Special thanks needs to be given to the Alderman Library at the University of Virginia, the Union Theological Seminary Library in Richmond, the Lutheran Brotherhood Foundation (Reformation Research Library) in St. Paul, and the Speer Library at Princeton Theological Seminary, especially to its archivist, Bill Harris, for his help and concern, and Kevin and Cathy Reilly for offering a place to stay and a whole lot more!

Preparation of the manuscript involved a number of people. Special thanks must be given to Vanessa Van Eaton who typed the majority of it with great skill and grace, and Doug Grossman, my lifelong friend, who applied his considerable computer-wizardry to produce the final draft.

The work was completed during a time of tribulation in my life. Special thanks must be given to those who sustained me—David and Laurie Kelly who sheltered me from the storms of the Antichrist; Lowell Sykes, Wayne Meredith, Phyllis Workman, and Rivermont Presbyterian Church who supported me in word and deed; former colleagues like Marc Clauson, Lee Hähnlen, Bill Matheny, and John Morrison who challenged me to persevere both spiritually and academically; the many students and friends who called to offer their encouragement (Reinhold Breckner, Todd Cummings, Kathy Dyer, Laurie Green, Tammy Hartman, Junius Hughes, Dorin Igna, Rob MacSwain, Ruth Schmidt, Christy Whiddon, Milo Zehr, Tom and Debbie deLorimier, Daniel and Mirela Moga, Ron and Valli Ritchie, Stan and Toni Rollison, and Tim and Sheri Simpson), and, of course, my family who served as a continual source of love and support through the years. All these helped to raise me from the dead and complete the task that is now before the reader. This work is certainly not the product of an isolated scholar but one who is radically dependent upon the body of Christ.
