

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS.

I am indebted to the generous help of many individuals and organizations in preparing this text, although the errors and opinions within remain my own. I would particularly like to express my thanks to Andrea Blackhurst, from whose supervision I gained more than she did; Peter Cumper for his valuable comments on Part I of the text, and general support; Lucy Vickers for her comments on the discussion of employment law; Carol Brennan for her comments on criminal law and criminal justice; and Anna Gear for her comments on the constitutional sections of the text. I have been fortunate in the support of both my Universities during the preparation of this text. This took the form of practical support from both Lancashire Law School and the Department of Law at Oxford Brookes University, and critical support from the Legal Studies Research Group at Lancashire and the Centre for Legal Research and Policy Studies at Brookes. The library staff at both institutions, especially the inter-library loan departments, deserve thanks, as do the staff of the Bodleian Law Library. I have also benefited from my discussions with, and the support of, the growing number of scholars working in this field, both on an individual basis and through a number of conferences. I would like to express my thanks to all participants at Taking Religious Convictions Seriously 1999, Religiously Motivated Physical Change 2000, Current Legal Issues 2000, and Theology and Jurisprudence 2001. The Arts and Humanities Research Board, whose support for sabbatical leave was matched by Lancashire Law School, gave financial support to this project. On a personal note, my debt to my family, especially to Eric and Jean Edge, remains my greatest.
