

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

This is a revised version of my doctoral dissertation. Like all dissertations, it owes its existence not only to the author, but to everyone who has contributed with support as well as criticism. In this respect, I have been unusually fortunate. The amount of help I have received from both persons and institutions goes far beyond what can be mentioned in a short preface. Some names, however, are too important to be passed over in silence.

My advisor Christoph Harbsmeier has, more than anyone else, shaped my views on the Chinese language and on linguistic research. He has not only read (and criticized harshly!) many of my unfinished drafts of parts of this book, but has also been a constant source of ideas and inspiration seldom more than a phone-call away.

From the very beginning, Marie-Claude Paris, Lu Jianming, and Ma Zhen have always been very generous with their time, ideas, and comments.

During his three months in Norway in 1992, S. M. Yakhontov read and commented upon drafts of many of the chapters in this book. I am deeply grateful for his extreme thoroughness and patience.

The ideas and comments of the following persons have also influenced parts of this book much more strongly than what is shown by the few acknowledgements in the text itself: C.-T. James Huang, Hu Mingyang, Derek Herforth (especially chapters 1 and 8), Randy LaPolla (especially chapter 1), Arnfinn Vonen (especially chapters 8 and 9), Elizabeth Lanza (especially chapter 9), He Leshi (especially chapter 10), James E. Dew (especially chapter 7), Bruce Williams (especially chapter 7), Sandra A. Thompson (especially chapters 8 and 9), Tao Hongyin (especially chapter 1), Waltraud Paul (especially chapter 1), Lin Ying-chin (especially chapter 10), Vibeke Børdahl (especially chapters 1 and 2), and Even Hovdhaugen.

Chapters 7, 8, 9, and 10 build on articles that were published in Journal of Chinese Linguistics, Cahiers de linguistique Asie Orientale, Acta Orientalia, and Zhongguo yuwen, respectively (Eifring 1988; 1991a; 1991b; 1991c). Thanks are due to the anonymous reviewers of these journals for their constructive comments.

I also owe a lot to the innumerable informants who have helped me discriminate between grammatical and ungrammatical sentences in Chinese.

Some of those who have spent most time answering questions and discussing problems concerning their own mother tongue include Yu Xiaoxing (于曉星), Chen Maiping (陳邁平), Li Lichuan (李麗娟), Lu Guangcheng (盧廣誠), and Wu Huichun (吳慧君). What appears in the book as “my” ideas often builds on ideas that were in fact first conceived by them.

I would like to thank Glenn Wells for correcting my English throughout this book, and Jon Dalby for proofreading the index.

Academic support would not have been enough, however, had I not also got the financial support needed to pursue a project like this over almost five years. First of all, the University of Oslo granted me a five-year research stipend from H. A. Benneche’s Foundation. I have also got grants for research travel through the University of Oslo, the Norwegian Research Council for Science and the Humanities, the Nordic Institute for Asian Studies, the Nansen Foundation, the Royal Ministry of Culture, and the Foundation for Non-Fiction Writers.

During the past five years, I have been attached to the Department of East Asian Studies (later included in the Department of East European and Oriental Studies) at the University of Oslo. The department has offered me excellent working conditions with an exceptional freedom, a room with a view, and sufficient time to devote myself wholeheartedly to the writing of this book.

I am also grateful to my friends in Acem School of Meditation and the cultural magazine Dyade both for taking over some of my responsibilities while I concentrated on completing this book and for being a constant source of inspiration.

Last but not least, Hsiao-Fen 小芬 deserves all the thanks she can get for her patience and support during these years.

With so much help, I am afraid I have no one but myself to blame for the shortcomings that are obviously still present in my work.

H.E.
