

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

The completion of this project, which started as a doctoral dissertation in the History Department of Harvard University, submitted in 1996, was the result of the direct or indirect contribution of several persons. First of all I want to thank Professor Cemal Kafadar for his help, encouragement and inspiration, for introducing to me the excitement of Ottoman history and for acquainting me with Mahmud Pasha. I also want to thank him for his advice, drawn from his deep knowledge of Ottoman history, and his ideas, without which this work would have been infinitely poorer; if it would have been written at all. I would like to thank Professor Angeliki Laiou for her constant help and rigorous guidance. Her contribution towards the completion of this study was crucial and I am grateful for her sound advice. The debt of this study to Professor Halil İnalcık is great and the importance of the ideas that he transmitted during the discussions that I had the honor to have with him in the spring of 1993 is disproportional to the brevity of our acquaintance. I would also like to thank him for reading the manuscript and providing me with important comments. The help and support of Professor Suraiya Faruqi was extremely valuable in the completion of this project and in the transformation of the doctoral dissertation into a book. I would like to thank her for taking the time to read the manuscript and for making thoughtful and important recommendations. I would like to thank Professor Şinasi Tekin for all that he has taught me about the Ottoman language and paleography and, in particular, I would like to express my gratitude to him and his wife, Professor Gönül Alpay Tekin, for their kind help in the translation of Ottoman verses. The advice and encouragement of the late Professor John A. Petropoulos were the main reasons for my decision to pursue the study of History and I would like to express my debt to him for this. More importantly, I am grateful to him because his example as a scholar and as a man is a constant source of inspiration to me.

The research necessary for this study was covered to a large extent through a grant of the A.G. Leventis Foundation of Paris and I thank the Foundation and Mr. G. Cassimatis for this. I am also grateful to the History Department of Harvard University for providing me with a Travelling Fellowship, which was used for my trip to Italy and Croatia. My long stay in Venice in the fall of 1994 would have been impossible without the kind hospitality provided by the Director, the late Professor Nikolaos Panagiotakis, and the staff of the Istituto Ellenico. The fellows of the Istituto also deserve mention here for helping me to orient myself in the maze of Venice and of the Venetian Archives and for their friendship. The staff of the Archivio di Stato of Venice should also be thanked for their help during my research there, and I would like to thank especially Professor Maria Pia Pedani and Professor Brendan Dooley. I would like also to thank the Director and staff of the Historical Archive of Dubrovnik, who did everything in their power to enable me to profit to the utmost from my brief sojourn in their beautiful city in March 1995.

Thanks are also due to many friends and colleagues who have contributed in various ways to this study: To Hülya Canbakal, Çiğdem Kafescioğlu and Leslie Schick, each of whom contributed in different crucial ways to this project, through discussions or with their practical assistance. To Himmet Taşkömür for kindly translating some passages from Arabic. To Selma Özkoçak for kindly permitting my access to her unpublished Ph.D. dissertation. To Demetrius Kyritses for the illuminating discussions we had on Byzantine and Ottoman history. To many friends who were at Harvard in the period 1990-1996 for indirect, yet valuable support in the completion of this project. To friends and relatives in Cyprus for their friendship and support. I am particularly grateful to Mr. Theodosios Nikolaou for his friendship and wisdom and for helping me in the translation of many Greek passages. I would also like to thank Mrs. Andriana Jones for reading the manuscript and helping in the improvement of language and style. Last but not least I should say that I owe my greatest debt to my parents and to my brother, Stefanos, for their constant support and encouragement through all these years.

Finally, special thanks should go to Assistant Editor Ms. Trudy Kamperveen and to the staff of Brill Academic Publishers, who made the publication of this project possible.
