

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

Thanks to colleagues and students at Capital University's Dayton Center for providing a scholarly community in which research and writing are valued as essential to teaching. Dean Gary Smith provided generous support in the form of a reduced load during the Winter term of 1998. Andy Carlson, Fetneh Ghavami, Mike Hoy, Robin Johnson, and Vic Olsen read and/or listened to bits and pieces of the manuscript over the past two years, as did a number of colleagues from Capital and elsewhere at a meeting of the Ohio Academy of Religion in Columbus in March 1998. Ken Rice read the entire manuscript as it came off the printer and provided perceptive comments and stimulating discussion in our study of the history of British socialism during the Winter 1998 term.

When I arrived at the University of Chicago in the mid-1970s, a refugee of sorts from doctrinal wars in the Lutheran Church-Missouri Synod, Bernie Brown introduced me to a world of Anglican social thought that added a new dimension to my Lutheran reading of Marx. When I returned to Chicago after a brief sojourn at the Episcopal Theological Seminary of the Southwest, he and Robin Lovin guided the study of F.D. Maurice that was the starting point for this book. Darrel Gilbertson enriched my reading further during several intense years of peace education in Amarillo. He read an early draft of the book and offered encouragement, as he so often has in the years that I've known him. Members of Epiphany Lutheran Church in Dayton responded thoughtfully to a presentation of the project and convinced me that the book has an audience beyond the academy.

I'm grateful to my family for unwavering support even when my passion for this work has bordered on obsession. Peggy and Regina, as always, are my best critics. My father, Herbert Schroeder (who is neither a socialist nor an Anglican), after sitting at the kitchen counter into the early hours of a January morning listening to my raving about an obscure Anglican theologian and his contribution to the history of socialism said, "That sounds like a book I'd like to read." This, as much as anything else, inspired me to get it done.
