

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

I am grateful to all those teachers who helped me gain the skills and knowledge necessary for my writing this book. Orville Baxter gave me, as a newly graduated pharmacy intern, one of the best pieces of advice I have ever received. "Pay attention to details," said Baxter. I took this advice to heart, and it has served me well in all of my endeavors. John Corcoran encouraged me to undertake the doctoral program in philosophy at the State University of New York at Buffalo and taught me to think clearly and logically. Elaine Hull helped me expand my basic knowledge in the human sciences into the more specialized domain of neuroscience. Barry Smith and Kah-Kyung Cho, each in his own way, introduced me to the delights of Continental philosophy, especially phenomenology. Barry also helped me hone my writing skills. Kenneth Inada taught me the essence of Buddhist and Taoist thought, which I have experienced as pure philosophies of mind. Carolyn Korsmeyer tackled the problem of the philosophical characterization of emotions in a seminar in which I worked out my views on love.

I am deeply indebted to my primary mentor Richard Hull for his unfailing support, encouragement, and practical advice during my transformation to a career in writing. This book draws upon material first presented in my doctoral dissertation completed and copyrighted by me in 1994 at the State University of New York at Buffalo for which Hull served as director.

I owe a debt of gratitude to my wife, Jo Anne Brocklehurst, who provided the emotional and financial support necessary for me to complete my schooling, and who served as my immediate editor for this book. In addition, I thank Gwen Burda for her technical expertise in transforming my manuscript to the form required for publication.

Figure 1 is reprinted by permission of BasicBooks, a division of HarperCollins Publishers, Inc., from page 37 of The Mind's New Science by Howard Gardner. Copyright © 1985 by Howard Gardner.