

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

This book is a revision of my doctoral dissertation, so primary thanks go to my advisor at The University of Chicago Divinity School, Michael Fishbane. Working with him during my final years as a graduate student decisively shaped my perspectives on biblical literature and midrash, and his good council and steady encouragement saw this particular project to completion. I also extend heartfelt thanks to the other members of my committee, John J. Collins and Wendy Doniger, for their careful reading and helpful suggestions. Many other people as well read chapters or smaller sections, including a dissertation reading group composed of Benjamin Sommer, Colleen Stamos, and Anthony Tomasino; Arthur J. Droge and Michael Wise, also at The University of Chicago; and Larry D. Bouchard, David P. Kovaks, Judith L. Kovaks, and Michael L. Satlow, at the University of Virginia. On two separate occasions, participants in The University of Chicago Jewish Studies Workshop responded to presentations of chapter drafts. Those listed above and the many others with whom I discussed this project more informally have my deepest gratitude. I also take this opportunity to recognize Jon D. Levenson, who served as my graduate advisor while I was doing course work at The University of Chicago, and to thank him for introducing me to rabbinic commentary on biblical texts.

Jennifer Geddes, Mari Schindele, and Lynn Tryggstad deserve special recognition for their conscientious and supportive editorial assistance at different stages in the emergence of the manuscript. Financial assistance from the University of Virginia Small Grants Committee, A. James Arnold and Marita P. McClymonds, Chairs, and from the University of Virginia Department of Religious Studies, Harry Y. Gamble, Jr., Chair, helped defray copy-editing expenses. I gratefully acknowledge John Collins yet a second time in his role as series editor, and I commend Hans van der Meij, Mattie Kuiper, Pim Rietbroek, and others at Brill for attending to the details of publication.

On a more personal level, I thank the Bertsche, Mulholland, and Erickson families for regularly welcoming our daughter Kaia into their homes, so that I could concentrate on research and writing. Kaia herself helped me maintain a proper attitude towards the academic world, and her contagious joy often refreshed me and inspired me to persist. I also thank my parents, Myrtle Vassberg and Robert Llewellyn Blevins, Jr., and my parents-in-law, Carol Jane and W. Robert Anderson, for their confidence in me. I owe most, though, to my husband, Bruce K. Tammen, who encouraged and supported me in every way imaginable. As an expression of appreciation, I dedicate this book to him.
