

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

The present study is a slightly revised version of my Ph.D. thesis which was accepted by the Faculty of Theology at the Free University, Amsterdam in the winter of 1994. My great indebtedness to my supervisor, Professor Henk Leene, can never be fully articulated. His careful reading of the manuscript and the many suggestions which he made were of immense help. I also wish to express my deep thanks to Professor Eep Talstra, my second supervisor, whose guidance has enabled me to come to terms with the new horizon of linguistic analysis of the ancient Hebrew text. I have learned a great deal from their active interest in this study as well as from their seminars and have no doubt incurred a debt which cannot be repaid. My warm appreciation also goes to Professors T. J. Baarda and J. C. de Moor, and to Dr. J. Vlaardingebroek and Dr. N. A. Schuman who supplied me with some constructive criticism in their capacity as external examiners of the dissertation.

I also would like to thank Professor Rolf Rendtorff for accepting the manuscript for publication in the BIBLICAL INTERPRETATION SERIES. Special thanks are due to Johan Rebel who willingly spent many days taking care of the book's final layout details. This study would not have been possible without tangible support from many friends and institutions. First of all, I am indebted to Calvin Theological Seminary (Grand Rapids, MI) who made my study in Amsterdam possible by providing a scholarship. The publication of this study was made possible through the generous financial support of the Torch Mission Foundation (Seoul, Korea) and the Free University of Amsterdam's Verkuyl fund.

Lastly, I would like to extend a special word of thanks to my family who have accompanied me throughout my theological journey and whose patience has been put to the test more times than I care to remember. For these and a myriad of other reasons they deserve my deepest love and affection: Yun-Soon Song, my mother; Yong-Ok, my wife; Amy, James, Jean, and David, my four lovely children. Above all, thanks be to God, our Lord. (Psalm 145:8-13)
