In its original form, this work was a dissertation submitted in 1999 to the George Washington University Law School for admission to the degree of Doctor of Juridical Science. Learning, like the law, is a process, and as a consequence there are many people who supported me at this stage and to whom I am so very grateful. In particular, I wish to express profound gratitude to Dr. Michael Singer for his constant and patient guidance throughout. He contributed to this book and to my development in many important ways. I am indebted also to Judge Thomas Buergenthal not only for his support during the Master of Laws and doctoral programs, but also for serving as my dissertation supervisor and continued mentoring. Finally, I would like to thank Dr. Louis B. Sohn for his good counsel at all levels, providing me with an incredible opportunity to learn from a master, and Professor Ralph G. Steinhardt for his thoughtful comments and participation on my dissertation committee.

My learning continued during the process of transforming my dissertation into a book manuscript and in this regard I would like to thank especially Professor Joan M. Fitzpatrick and, as well, Dr. David J. Bederman and Dr. Burns H. Weston for editorial commentary and stewardship that ensured the success of this transformation. I wish to extend also my deepest gratitude to the members of the Procedural Aspects of International Law editorial board for reviewing my manuscript and Dr. Sean Murphy for presenting my dissertation to the editorial board.

Others, too, have earned my abiding gratitude. I thank Herb Somers, international law librarian at George Washington University; Jeanne Dixon, librarian at the U.N. Information Center in Washington D.C.; and Markus G. Schmidt of the Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights, each of whom provided invaluable research assistance. In addition, I thank the friends who have made themselves available for critique, research assistance, and proofing during the critical final stages of this process, especially Peter Bäumlér, Sylvain Beauchamp, Esteban Brenes, Kevin Brosnahan, Martin Molina, Manuel Rybach, and Kira Spreng. Particular gratitude is owed to Courtney W. Howland for her numerous valuable suggestions.

Finally, I honor both my mother, who taught me the love of learning, and my father and many friends, without whose support this work would never have been possible.
