

ACKNOWLEDGMENT

I wrote this book while a Visiting Fellow at the University of Wales, Lampeter, on sabbatical leave from the University College of Cape Breton, Nova Scotia. I would like to thank both institutions for their support. In particular, I wish to thank the following individuals from the Lampeter academic community: David Cockburn for his candid discussion of two papers I read at seminars in Lampeter, and for permission to quote from a special collection of papers he edited on Death and the Value of Life (Saint David's University: Trivium, 1992). I am grateful to Paul Badham of the Department of Theology, Religious Studies and Islamic Studies, Saint David's University, Lampeter, for permission to quote from his unpublished article, "Religion, Science, and Philosophy." I have found their work to be of great value in the preparation of my own text. I am grateful to James Robinson, intellectual at-large, for his commentary on my interpretation of Heidegger and Wittgenstein. He often set me straight. Thanks for his friendship while I was in Lampeter. I owe a debt of gratitude to Morland Beazley, who is pursuing his own work on angels at Lampeter, for arranging frequent meetings with doctoral students. We engaged in stimulating discussions of the afterlife, and on John Hick's Evil and the God of Love (1977), while sipping on a good cup of tea. These individuals exemplify the tradition of Vera Lex (Journal of the Natural Law Society) in action. My thanks to Virginia Black, Executive Editor, Vera Lex, for permission to quote from an article written by Robert Humphrey in Vera Lex, 14:1&2. I wish to express special thanks to Virginia Black for her role as my Editor. Since 1996, she has conscientiously been my partner in this project, suggesting in a soft, insightful voice not only the meaning of words, but the meaning of sentences. Her dedication to the rigors of natural law theory sharpened my own interest in the universal as transcultural experience. I thank my family for their love and support at those times when our relationship was reduced to an e-mail connection.

Grateful acknowledgment is extended to Bantam Doubleday Dell Publishing Group, Inc. for permission to quote a story from Anthony de Mello's (1984) The Song of the Bird. My thanks to ITP Nelson Canada for permission to quote from People, Penguins, and Plastic Trees. Second Edition. Christine Pierce and Donald Van De Veer eds. (1995). References to these and other quotations appearing in the book are noted in Works Cited.
