

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

In the process of writing this book, I received assistance from a number of friends and colleagues the importance of whose contributions cannot be overstated. Without the benefit of their learning, candid criticism, and thoughtful suggestions, this book would have been less than it is now.

To Sepp Gumbrecht, I wish to express my gratitude for arranging a semester of research as a guest of the Institut für Geistes- und Sozialwissenschaften at the Universität-Gesamthochschule Siegen, where I began to research the discovery of epic culture; to the library at the University of California at Santa Cruz for access to its collections and for providing a beautiful space in which to write; and to Brian and Sharon Beach for the use of their home in Santa Cruz for two successive summers, during which time I wrote the first drafts. To my senior colleagues Paul Rahe (History) and Jacob Howland (Philosophy) I am most deeply indebted for crucial support and encouragement together with suggestions for substantive improvements. Winder McConnell has been this work's good angel. His judicious assessment of an early draft led to numerous revisions; his careful editing of later drafts helped to correct many an error. I wish also to express my heartfelt thanks to him for the confidence he displayed in this work by placing it in a favorable light before the editors of the Davis Series in Medieval Texts and Studies. To Chris Anderson I am indebted for carefully reading and marking the manuscript. Charles Segal, Andrew Miller, Stephen Scully, Ed Haymes, George Odell, Gerhard Richter, Jean Godsall-Myers, Vibes Petersen, Bryn Barnard, and several anonymous readers were all most generous in offering comments, suggestions, and frank criticisms. Tom Benediktson has been unfailingly cheerful and amazingly prompt in responding to my numerous requests for his expert help with the Latin texts. Marc Fitzerman gave of his valuable time to help me with the Hebrew.

Many students have contributed to the ideas expressed in the book as it now stands. Among them, I would like to mention in particular the members of a Senior Seminar in Women's Studies at the University of Tulsa on the subject of "The Queen and Her Lovers." Several classes of honors students at the University of Tulsa have also been most helpful in testing and refining some of the arguments put forward here. Most memorable was the pizza box demonstration of battle dynamics put on by Jim Rion. Wade McKenzie, likely the most brilliant of those I have had the good fortune to have as a student, advised, encouraged, and cajoled with the passion of a co-author. Beyond his many services as a research assistant, I owe him a debt of gratitude for taking on the index, typing the Latin and Greek, and twice proofing the manuscript in its penultimate and ultimate versions.

In readying the book for publication, I had the invaluable assistance of Elena Zorn, who prepared the diagrams. In Carol Kealiher I found the ideal copy editor. I will be endlessly grateful for her devotion to detail, consistency, and accuracy. In addition to her unflagging energy, I cannot say enough about her selfless commitment of time to this project, which she has treated as if it were her own. My esteemed colleague Reggie Hyatte, author of two works published by E. J. Brill, was most thoughtful in providing templates for the book's format. James Kelley proofed the entire manuscript and prepared the camera ready copy. Julian Deahl and the staff of editors and production assistants at Brill showed exceptional patience and tact in their dealings with me as they saw the book through to publication.

The University of Tulsa was most supportive, providing me with several Faculty Development Grants, thus insuring that I had ample time for research and writing. I particularly appreciate the financial support arranged by Al Soltow, Director of Research, and Thomas Horne, Dean of Arts and Sciences; both contributed funds for copy editing and indexing.

Finally, I would like to thank Leah Udwin for contributing in so many ways to this book project. Her interest inspired the work; her steadfast commitment enabled me to complete it. Her critical mind deepened the research; her questions sharpened the writing.
