“Of the three powers which may dispute the basic position of science, religion alone is to be taken seriously as an enemy. Art is almost always harmless and beneficent; it does not seek to be anything but an illusion. . . . Philosophy is not opposed to science, it behaves like a science and works in part by the same method; it departs from it, however, by clinging to the illusion of being able to present a picture of the universe which . . . is coherent, though one which is bound to collapse with every fresh advance in our knowledge. It goes astray in its method by overestimating the epistemological value of our logical operations and by not accepting other sources of knowledge such as intuition” (Freud, New Introductory Lectures on Psychoanalysis).
