

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

Writing acknowledgments is a task doubly rewarding: it marks for the author the end of a long, essentially lonely voyage; and it affords the opportunity to express gratitude to the many people who in ways major and minor facilitated the journey's successful completion.

Research for this study was launched with the aid of a stipend from the National Endowment for the Humanities and was continued under a grant from the U.S. Institute of Peace. I take this opportunity to thank both Washington-based institutions for their generous assistance. And for their role in administering the latter grant, I wish to thank Dr. Hrach Gregorian, Mrs. Naomi Cohen, and Professor Michael Curtis.

To Dr. Shabtai Rosenne, the Doyen of all present-day scholars working in the World Court vineyard, I, along with so many others, owe a general intellectual debt. In addition, I have special reasons for expressing my thanks to him at this time, because my keen interest in the Court was rekindled in the wake of the article which I was privileged to contribute to the Festschrift produced in his honor. Moreover, I have benefited greatly from the valuable nuggets of information, insights and advice which he so kindly shared with me from time to time.

I am happy to have this occasion to express, if only minimally, my profound gratitude to my colleague and friend, Professor Ruth Lapidoth, without whose graciousness, wise counsel, and extraordinary willingness to bear extra burdens in order to ease mine, this work could not have come to fruition.

Other colleagues who have been helpful in more ways than they can know are Professor Danny Fefferman and Dr. Moshe Hirsch. I wish also to thank Judge Elyakim Rubinstein for his encouragement at critical stages, Professor Louis Henkin for providing useful documentation, Professor Berel Septimus for some timely assistance, and Gita and Charlie Siegman, for their boundless support and friendship during my stints in Washington.

In collecting the voluminous material for this tome, I had occasion to avail myself of the facilities of libraries on two continents. My thanks go to the staff of the National and University Library of Jerusalem, and especially Shelly Benvenisti and Kochevet Ben-Schacher for unfailingly and cheerfully attending to my numerous research needs over the years; Shlomo Goldberg, head of the Library's Lending Division; Amnon Sadovsky, also of the National Library; the librarians at the American Cultural Center Library in Jerusalem under the direction of Ruby Apsler — and especially Jennie (Yaffa) Erentreu, Jackie Stein, Felicity Aziz, and Ralph Amelan — for the kind and expeditious manner in which my research inquiries were always handled; Miriam Schatz-Sharon of the Hebrew University Law Library, who was consistently helpful and unbureaucratic in her approach; and Chana Tal, a more recent bright addition to the Law Library staff. In Washington, Jill McClanahan Watson, Director of Library Services at the American Society of International Law ferreted out valuable materials for me on short call, prepared useful bibliographical material, and, in general, served far beyond the call of duty. Kuldeep Dosanjh, of the ASIL Library, was also most helpful and courteous, as was the staff at the American University Law Library.

A special very warm note of thanks is due to Meir Zorin at the Hebrew University, whose technical help was indispensable countless times and whose friendliness and kind disposition made every trip to the photocopying room a pleasure rather than a chore. I am also grateful to Lisa Clayton for so patiently offering me the benefit of her expertise on several matters related to the production of this volume, and to Benny Kaliner for his advice.

I am indebted to Keith B. Sharfman for his magnificent assistance, through the marvels of the Internet and E-mail technology, in the preparation of the bibliography. My thanks, too, to the Rothner family for providing serene surroundings during some of the most trying crucial last stages of the manuscript's completion.

Alan Stephens and the entire staff of Nijhoff have been most understanding and accommodating; and Richard O'Regan did a superb job with a particularly complex manuscript.

The customary final "spousal acknowledgment" is more than pro forma in this case. To Shlomo, for plowing through the long manuscript and offering helpful comments and for the endless sacrifices over such a long period, my eternal gratitude.
