

PREFACE

There are at least four things you can do with international law. You can apply it to an external subject matter. You can combine it with another discipline. You can litigate with it. Or you can turn it inward, examining itself.

In this second volume of collected papers, I try to do two-and-a-half of these four things. I apply international law to the global environment, to human rights, and to foreign relations; this comprises the first four Parts of the book. Second, I combine international law with the discipline of political science (Part V). However, this volume does not include international law litigation, a subject that I am reserving for a future volume. Nor do I include pure theory, a subject that I am also reserving for a future volume. But I do turn international law "inward" in a different way in the last Part of the book, which contains reflections on how international law is studied and what students might want to do with it.

I would like to thank my secretary Mary Finn for her careful work on this project. She came up with the idea of a cumulative index. My research has been funded by Judd and Mary Morris Leighton, donors of the Leighton Chair. I appreciate the support that Dean David Van Zandt has given to this project. And thanks to Rick Kirgis for his kind Foreword.

Anthony D'Amato
Leighton Professor of Law
Northwestern University