

PREFACE

From the galaxy of people who have whetted my mind for things literary and theological I should like to acknowledge my special indebtedness to a few stars who have shown me particular warmth and insight at times when I most needed encouragement. First, I would like to pay respect to Professor Ross Garner, who was kind enough to regard my first embarrassing fumbblings with religion and literature as if they were important, for trying to teach me how to write about such matters, all too in vain, with precision and grace. His profound influence on the conduct and content of my mind will be abundantly clear on every page.

Secondly, I would like to pay tribute to my professor, adviser and friend, the late Helen C. White, whose patience and guidance brought me to a deep appreciation of seventeenth-century life and letters. Finally, I would like to mention two theologians, both brothers-in-law, who have kept my awareness of theological matters as keenly honed as they were able: the late Professor Carl Michalson and Professor Paul Clasper. Their imprints on my thinking are probably greater than they ever imagined.

I should like to thank Language and Style for permission to include the material (in slightly different form) which makes up Chapter Five. Similarly, I thank Neuphilologische Mitteilungen for allowing me to use material contained in Chapters Eight and Ten. Margaret Pyle Hassert deserves particular thanks for her illuminating suggestions and thorough proofreading of the text.

Blue Hill, Maine
August 1974