First, I want to acknowledge my gratitude to two individuals who helped me to get out from under the heavy teaching and paper-correcting load at Cortland College so that I had time for research and writing.

When Alfred Weber of the University of Tübingen hired me as a visiting professor, I was able to write the first half of the book and present it as a lecture course. And when Norbert Platz of the University of Trier hired me for what amounted to a two-year research professorship, I was able to update and finish the book and try it out in the form of another course of lectures. I also want to thank the State University of New York, because in between my Tübingen and Trier appointments, I received a summer research grant from the SUNY Research Foundation which helped me turn the Tübingen lectures into a preliminary draft of this book.

Secondly, I want to thank three individuals whose assistance was crucial. Above all, I am grateful for the help of my wife Doreen on whose patience I imposed by making her listen to my ideas before I put them on paper and by asking her to help me proofread the book. Then I want to thank my two research assistants at the University of Trier, Anja Geist and Ursula Konrad, who compiled bibliographies, got hold of secondary literature for me, and helped me prepare the materials for the lectures on which this book is based.
