The idea for this book was born while I was working on my doctoral dissertation at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem under the supervision of Professor Michael Graetz. I wish to express my appreciation and gratitude to Professor Graetz, who first introduced me to the importance of economic elites in Jewish history, for his constant encouragement and support over the years. My colleague, Dr. Robert Cohen, read the entire manuscript and provided much constructive criticism and many learned suggestions. Professor Lloyd P. Gartner, Professor Bernard Wasserstein and Dr. Alon Kadish gave generously of their time and offered useful advice and information. Michael Zakim and Ann Scheman suggested innumerable and valuable stylistic improvements. Their efforts and dedication have resulted in a far better text than I could have produced myself.

This research was supported by grants from the Anglo-Israel Association, the Simon Segal Memorial Fund at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, and the Research Authority of Haifa University, whose staff also provided me with excellent technical assistance.

I am also grateful for the valuable help provided by the following institutions and their staffs: Haifa University Library, the Jewish National and University Library, Israel State Archives, the Central Zionist Archives, the Weizmann Archives, the Mocatta Library and Anglo-Jewish Archives, University College Library, the Board of Deputies of British Jews, the British Library, Samuel Montagu & Co., the House of Lords Record Office, the Public Record Office, the Indian Record Office, the Royal Institute for Foreign Affairs, Trinity College Library, Cambridge — and I wish to thank them all.
