

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

No writer on the International Court can fail to recognize his debts to the writings of all his predecessors in the field, particularly de Bustamante y Sirven, Fachiri, Fitzmaurice, Guyomar, Hudson, Jenks, Hersch Lauterpacht, Elihu Lauterpacht, Politis, Salvioli, Schwebel, Sohn, von Stauffenberg, Thirlway and Witenberg. Without their work no modern research on the topic can be undertaken, and their influence has guided my every page. This general acknowledgment takes the places of detailed and repeated citation from those writers—which would add considerably to the length of this already long book.

It is a pleasant duty to make public acknowledgment of the assistance received from friends and colleagues, many of whose names have already been mentioned. Over the years I have had many pleasant exchanges with Members of the Court, for which I am very thankful. I remain under a permanent debt of gratitude to the present and all former Registrars of the Court and to the staff, for the unfailing kindness with which they have met my all too frequent requests for information. Their assistance has been particularly valuable in bringing to my notice published but little known material not easily available. Their willingness to share their time and their insistence on remaining anonymous all accord with the highest standards of public service. The Legal Counsel of the United Nations since its beginnings in 1946 and members of the staff of the Office of Legal Affairs of the United Nations Secretariat, and many of their colleagues in other international organizations, as well as in different Ministries for Foreign Affairs, have all been very helpful to me over the years, and it gives me pleasure to place this on record. I have gained much insight into the working of the Court, into the problems of international litigation, into the political intricacies which governments face when considering the judicial settlement of their disputes, from conversations with friends and colleagues, in different delegations at the United Nations and at many of the major law-making conferences that have taken place during the last 50 years, in the International Law Commission, the Institute of International Law and elsewhere.

I was greatly encouraged in my initial research by the Israel Ministry for Foreign Affairs, which has continued to encourage me to persevere in this. For this volume, I have to thank particularly Mr Richard Simmonds, Documents Officer of the Permanent Mission of Israel to the United Nations in New York, and Mr Yehuda Mehaber who occupies a similar position in the Ministry for Foreign Affairs in Jerusalem. These have kept me fully supplied with all current and not-so-current United Nations documentation which, as the reader will see, is heavy. I also have to thank the Librarians and their staff of the different libraries in which I have worked during the preparation of this volume. These include the Jewish National and University Library in Jerusalem, the Library of the Israel Ministry for Foreign Affairs, the Library of the University of Virginia School of Law, the United Nations Dag Hammarskjöld Library in New York and the Peace Palace Library at The Hague. In these libraries working has always been a pleasure.