

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

This book, even more than most, is the work of many hands, many minds and many hearts, for without the enthusiastic support of some who played no direct role in its shaping it would never have come into being. First among these is Georgette F. Bennett, Ph.D., President of the Tanenbaum Center for Interreligious Understanding, under whose auspices the study which led to this manuscript was conceived and conducted; without her unflagging support and personal effort we would never have had the resources required for the effort. And backing her—and us—through their contributions to the Tanenbaum Center were the FJC (Foundation for the Jewish Community) and Paul Newman, at the suggestion of Leo Nevas.

Nor were these the only individuals who provided support. At Princeton University, we received donations from:

- The Center for the Study of Religion (Professor Robert Wuthnow, Director.)
- The Center of International Studies (Professor Aaron Friedberg, Director.)
- The Council of the Regional Studies (Professor Jeffrey Herbst, Director.)
- The Lichtenstein Institute for the Study of Self-Determination (Professor Wolfgang Danspeckgruber, Director.)

And this was in addition to both the administrative support and the intellectual stimulus provided by others at the University.

Foremost among these was Richard A. Falk, Albert G. Milbank Professor of International Law and Practice, Princeton University, who served as a member of our Steering Committee. In this he was joined by Dr. Jane Holl-Lute, Executive Vice President of the United Nations Foundation, former Executive Director of the Carnegie Commission on Preventing Deadly Conflict; and Dr. James Turner Johnson, Professor of Religion at Rutgers University, who capped his intellectual involvement by contributing a paper on The Law of Nations: Religion, Ethics and International Law Bearing on Conflict and Peace.

Of him, as of all the contributors, it must be said that he combined great and relevant knowledge with intellectual rigor, analytical skills and an ability to write clearly which you will find manifested in the papers that follow. Equally importantly, from the viewpoint of the editors, they showed a willingness to adjust both the content and the context of their inputs so that these would mesh more smoothly with one another and fit better into the overall framework of the book. For this alone, they should all be blessed!

We would also like to note the stellar performance of Ms. Nahide Bayrasli, Program Associate in the Program on Religion and Conflict Resolution at the Tanenbaum Center. Ms. Bayrasli played a significant role in everything from organizing the conference at Princeton University at which both authors and guests discussed Religion, Law and the Role of Force to helping to bring the resultant product into a coherent whole to preparing the manuscript for publication. And in this process, her substantive contributions were even more notable than her administrative ones.

Finally, we, the editors, would like to thank Mr. John Berger of Transnational Publishers, Inc. both for accepting for publication what was at the time an intellectual skeleton and for helping us, by his comments and suggestions, not only to flesh it out but to beautify it. We hope that the resultant product is both appealing and solid.

J. I. Coffey, Ph.D.
Director Emeritus
Program on Religion and Conflict Resolution
Tanenbaum Center for Interreligious Understanding

Charles T. Mathewes, Ph.D.
Professor of Religion
University of Virginia