

Acknowledgments

The idea of this book was born during the enlightening sessions of the International Congress on Kommunikation zwischen Orient und Okzident: Alltag und Sachkultur (Krems, 1992). A special thanks is accorded to the Instituts für Realienkunde des Mittelalters und der frühen Neuzeit, for providing me and my husband with both hospitality and a stimulating spiritual and intellectual environment. Research for this book was supported by the University of Haifa Research Fund.

The present work was not conceived as an addition to the rather overburdened shelf of communication studies. Rather, it is an attempt to clarify the involvement of Jews in and their contribution to the development of communication in the pre-modern world. Obviously, without the assistance of colleagues who shared their scholarly knowledge with me and contributed to this collection, this work would never have been completed. To them I express my deep gratitude. I am also thankful to Shoshana Mansfeld for designing the maps; to Genoveba Breitstein who was responsible for the word processing, and to A. M. Goldstein whose trained eye provided me with the most valuable editorial criticism and whose conversations helped clarify obscure passages in the text.

Haifa, November 1995