The Babylonian Talmud and the Bomberg Editions

The Babylonian Talmud, primarily a legal composition, is nevertheless a collage of Talmudic literature in all its various forms. More than any other work, the Babylonian Talmud influenced the unique way of life of the Jewish people and molded its character. The fate of the Talmud resembles the fate of the Jewish people. The Talmud was persecuted, banned, and even burned, beginning with the thirteenth century. Because of its vast scope and the use of the Aramaic language, Christian theologians were not familiar with the contents of the Talmud, and depended on hostile misinformation or translated sections that were purposely selected to discredit the work and bring about its eradication.

With the advent of the Renaissance and the rise of Humanism in the fifteenth and the beginning of the sixteenth century, Christian scholars began to study ancient languages, among them Hebrew and Aramaic. Only then did the Talmud find advocates among Christian scholars and clergy.

In the dispute over the Talmud which developed between the Humanists and the Reactionists, the Humanists, who studied the Talmud, prevailed, but for a brief period only. The printing house of Daniel Bomberg was founded at the end of this period. The history of Bomberg's Talmud editions reflect the cultural shift which took place in the Christian world in the first half of the sixteenth century. The first edition was printed by Bomberg at the request of Pope Paul X. A large part of the last edition was already printed in secret under the guise of previous editions, for fear of the reactionary Inquisition whose strength increased in the 1540s until it brought about, in the 1550s, the burning of the Talmud in particular and of Hebrew literature in general.

This last Bomberg edition is now the scarcest of all. Perhaps the proximity of this edition to the great burning of the Talmud, which started in 1553 was responsible for the extinction of large parts of this edition, which was still in the printer's warehouse.

The scarcity of the tractates of the last edition, combined with the false dates on many of them, concealed the true scope of this edition from scholars, who until now believed that it was far more limited than it actually was. The 39 tractates of this edition, all of which are included in this microfiche collection, indicate that in spite of difficulties and fears, most and perhaps even all of the 43 tractates of the Babylonian Talmud were printed in that last edition, and their text had probably been examined and corrected anew at that time.

The place of the Bomberg Editions in the history of the Talmudic text

The development of the Talmudical text began after its redaction at the beginning of the sixth century. For several centuries, this vast composition was studied and transmitted orally. In the middle of the eighth century manuscripts of the Talmud appeared for the first time. These were mainly used by students in academies outside Babylonia. In Babylonia, oral recitation of the Talmud continued. This manner of transmission - which partially involved free phrasing - brought about the creation of different versions. When those versions were set down in writing, large variations were found between one manuscript and another.

Students of the Talmud, particularly those in France and Germany, were confused by the variants and tended to see them as textual corruptions. Confidence in the credibility of the Talmudic text was shaken, and this led to a surfeit of emendations, corrections, and reconciliations of contradictions in the Talmudical text and content.

The state of the Talmudic text on the eve of the first Bomberg edition was therefore varied and each scribe and printer chose for himself the source he decided to copy from. Since its appearance, the complete Bomberg edition has been the source on which most of the subsequent editions were based. Without being especially authoritative, the text in the Bomberg edition became the textus receptus and if changes or corrections were made, they were made in it. Thus, the text of the Talmud we use today was established primarily by that edition, which represents an ultimate point in the development of the Talmudic text.

It was not the quality of the text, but rather factors of convenience that made the first Bomberg edition the textus receptus from which the subsequent editions evolved. However, because it became the standard text, this edition precipitated a wave of corrections in an effort to purify the standard text and transform it from merely the accepted version into the authoritative version. This process began immediately in subsequent Bomberg editions, which already contain corrections and changes.

Daniel Bomberg and his Talmud Editions

Daniel Bomberg was one of the most prominent printers of Hebrew literature of all times and certainly the most important in the sixteenth century. He followed his father, a wealthy merchant from Antwerp, to Venice, made the acquaintance of the Humanist circle, and studied Hebrew under the convert Felix Pratensis. Encouraged by his teacher, he established the first Hebrew printing shop in Venice. In the course of a few years, Bomberg completed projects that his predecessors had been carrying out over long periods and for which they needed partners and co-printers to complete. But the largest and the most impressive of all his projects was the printing of the Babylonian Talmud accompanied by the Rabbinic commentaries and rulings.

Of all the printers who preceded Bomberg the most productive had been Gershom Soncino, who printed 23 tractates over a period of 35 years. In contrast, Daniel Bomberg, quick to fulfill the Pope's request, completed the printing of the 43 tractates of the Babylonian Talmud, a large proportion of them from manuscripts, in three years. In the course of the next 25 years, Bomberg repeated the project on various scales. Most of the Talmud tractates were printed in his house three times in four editions, corresponding with each of the four periods in the history of the Bomberg printing house. Contrary to the myth that Bomberg lost his money in the printing of the Talmud, this printing apparently served as the financial basis for the activity of the printing shop, because of the ready market which existed for the tractates.

The division of the four editions

The four editions of the Bomberg tractates are divided as follows:

Edition	Status	No. of tractates	Years of publication
First	Complete	43 (+4)	1520-1523
Second	Incomplete	33	1526-1531
Third	Partial	8	1538-1539
Fourth	Incomplete	39	1543-1549

The present microfiche edition

This microfiche edition includes all of the 123(+4) tractates of the four editions of the Babylonian Talmud published by the printing house of Daniel Bomberg. No library has such a complete collection of the Bomberg tractates. Some tractates were previously unknown, of a few tractates only a single copy was found. Many tractates have been correctly identified for the first time and their proper bibliographical details established. With the assistance of distinguishing criteria, national, public and private libraries have been searched to locate the various tractates in their different editions. The yield of this search is available to scholars for the first time.

This microfiche edition gives the Talmudic philologist easy access - and sometimes the only one - to these rare texts, whether he wishes to check a single reading or to prepare a critical scientific edition.

For students of the history of printing, the collection offers an excellent synopsis of books issued by Bomberg's printing house in various periods. The collection enables scholars to compare the typographic inventory and its applications, the level of the editing in those periods, and so on.

For librarians, collectors, and bibliophiles in general, the collection provides an opportunity to make comparisons or to verify the identity of the edition they already have or wish to acquire.

For the students of the history of the period, its culture and economy, this microfiche collection provides valuable material for the analysis of the impact of economic circumstances as well as external influences on one of the most important and provocative publications of that time.

Guide to Daniel Bomberg's Talmud editions

A chronological list of the tractates and their fiche nos. including:

- a. The commentaries and compendia which accompany each tractate. These are listed and numbered in the description of Tractate no.1. In subsequent tractates, these numbers are used as reference and only additional texts are listed. Texts which are not mentioned in the titlepage appear between square brackets.
- b. Pagination by leaves, sheets and quires (i.e. several sheets folded together) as well as a register (i.e. a list of the first words of each sheet, arranged by quires) as appear in the tractates.
- c. Bibliographical references (cf. abbreviations), which point to earlier lists and descriptions
- d. Libraries where copies were found, listed by abbreviation, the first is the photographed copy. Being a guide, not a census, condition and number of copies in each library and their shelf nos. are not indicated and not all the known copies are recorded. Some mixed copies are indicated by @ and some copies that need checking or rechecking are mentioned in round brackets.
- e. Notes: colophon (the long ones summarised the short ones translated) liturgical text, details of additional compendia, people involved in printing the tractate, indications or means of dating (e.g. location of tractate's name *, dots on roman numbers, etc. cf. Ros. p.391 ff.) variant copies, some differences between editions, some copies mentioned in the literature, but not found.

(* location (a) is described in Tr.no.1; location (b) in Tr.no.28; location (c) in Tr.no.48 ; location (m) in Tr.no.26)
